SRM is the one most commonly used in the U.S., and it expresses beer color using a numbering system of 1-40, with the lower the number, the lighter the beer, and vice versa. And that works fairly well, especially for reviews or judging since it's reasonably easy to determine if a beer hits its range for a particular style.

As with most questions about beer, the answer involves chemistry – in fact, a number of factors can affect color, and we'll take a closer look at all of them. We'll also examine what beer color can (and can't) cue us to expect in terms of flavor, as well as how beer color is measured and described.

What Determines the Color of Beer? | The Beer Connoisseur

The color of a beer is an important visual cue and part of the overall sensory appeal of evaluating a brew. Brewers carefully control the color of their beers and define the colors on the Lovibond scale. The higher the number, the darker the color of the beer. The Boot, a Louisiana Exclusive, is a 5 and Turbodog is a 60 on the Lovibond scale.
